

1 July 2006

By: Silviu Stahie, Video and PC Games Editor

'Age of Conan' Enters First Phase of Beta Testing

Gone into beta, and getting more and more users over time

Funcom announced that 'Age of Conan' is entering the first phase of beta testing. The 'Age of Conan' Beta will evolve gradually with more and more external testers being added as the game moves closer to launch. The first stage of Beta will include people from Funcom's Quality Assurance Department and selected experienced Beta testers under NDA. During the fall more external testers will be included in the Beta. Beta signs-up will be announced broadly when Funcom is ready to process applications. "We have worked hard on 'Age of Conan' for more than two years, and it's great to see that our collective effort has led us to this point", said Trond Arne Aas, CEO of Funcom. "The game already looks stunning and it's a lot of fun to play. We are looking forward to include our community, partners and press once we move into the later stages of the Beta." Funcom would like to remind interested Beta testers that signing up for the Conan newsletter as well as registering on the official forums will increase the chance of getting a Beta spot.