If you decided to go modern and bought a state of the art new television, running with a flatscreen and tons of plasma-stuff, it's most likely that you're a sound lover as well. Now, not that the TV-lovers and sound enthusiasts would be adversaries, and being an audiophile does not necessarily involve having a TV; however, a most nifty television would be a real shame without the proper sound. Leon have managed to create a loudspeaker that would not only match pretty much any plasma screen on the planet and look good, but would also deliver you a sound well worthy of being compared to the sonic response offered by top-notch audiophiles in-room speakers. The Leon Seven sports a massive milled aluminum enclosure and a very sturdy front baffle; everything is kept in place by an enhanced structure of braces and strutting allowing a performance that is virtually free from any unwanted resonance and cabinet coloration. These speakers run on a pair of the acclaimed hand-made Eton Hexacone drivers completed with the Raven R2 True Ribbon tweeters. This way, the response of the Leon Seven reaches from a 40Hz bass reflex-rounded LF to an audiophile-grade 50kHz upper cutoff point. If you are worried about how loud these speakers can get, rest assured as they are quite capable as far as rocking your room is concerned: regardless of whether you're using them for movies or music, these loudspeakers can throw a massive 250W RMS power in your room, each, allowing for a most impressive acoustic experience. These speakers also come with nifty cloth removable front grilles that let you instantly change the way your Leon Sevens look: let them on and enjoy a classic, "well-behaved" appearance or take them off for a wild look. The Leon Seven sell for a rather hefty sum, running from $15K and topping $20K. Now, if you really feel like owning some of the planet's niftiest TV-side speakers, pay a visit to a Leon and ask for a Seven.
