

27 June 2006

By: Elena Gorgan, Entertainment News Editor

Harry Potter's Foretold Death?

J.K Rowling, creator of the famous character talks about the seventh book

One of the most popular books and movies ever is 'Harry Potter', depicting a child wizard fighting, together with a bunch of good friends, against the forces of darkness and saving the world. The story is known worldwide and loved both by grown-ups and by children of all ages. Last night, in a televised interview, its creator, ex unemployed and single mother, Rowling, has dropped the biggest hint ever regarding the final book. Unsuspecting fans learned that, besides two major characters that will be written off in the seventh part of Harry's adventures, the wonder boy himself is in danger of perishing. Apparently, Rowling loves Agatha Christie's idea who, in her last book, chose to kill off her hero, Hercule Poirot, so that nobody could possibly write about him after her death. The now millionaire novelist admitted that she hadn't thought before of killing Harry Potter, but that may prove to be the case, as she is completely aware that, when the series ends, there will be no other character like him. Rowling told the interviewer that the seventh book is already drafted (since 1990) and few changes have been added to its plot. It is supposed that it will be published sometime next year but it's certain that its author will not disclose any more details from it.