Princess Margaret's Lesbian Kisses and Cannabis Sessions

The British royal family might take legal action against the producer of the upcoming British TV series focuses on the late Princess' life during the 1950s and 1960s.

The late Princess Margaret is shown having sex, sharing a lesbian kiss and smoking cannabis in the upcoming British TV drama to be broadcast on Channel 4. The TV program is based on the late Princess' life during the 1950s and 1960s, but the way her life is portrayed has really sparked outrage, as she engages in oral sex, kisses Sharman Douglas, daughter of an American Congressman, and smokes a joint at a London party in the drama, according to monstersandcities.com. The British royal family might be considering taking legal action against its producers, for the explicit content of the program, and intend to stop the broadcast or at least to get some scenes deleted. The film, starring Lucy Cohu is said to be an accurate dramatization on the life of the late princess, but her husband stated he had never been contacted by the producers, and the research is very poor. Meanwhile, Channel 4 controller Kevin Lygo says: "I don't know if Her Majesty will be watching, but we could send her a Dvd. Some will find it quite arresting and challenging. It's factually accurate and a racy romp". Princess Margaret was one of the most glamorous figure, famous for her sparkle and charm. A lifelong smoker, the Princess married Earl Snowdon and had two children, Viscount Linley and Lady Sarah Armstrong-Jones. Her affair with Roddy Llewellyn has ended her troubled marriage. She was known for her great love of ballet and her friendship with the flamboyant Rudolph Nureyev, but also for patroning the Royal Ballet, as well as other charities.
