Sharon Stone's Annual Custody

Roan, the actress's adopted son will spend one year with one parent and then the next year with the other

Sharon Stone lost custody of her son, Roan, but not for good... The "Basic Instinct" actress made a strange agreement with her ex-husband, Phil Bronstein concerning five-year-old son. A mediator in the couple's custody case suggested an unusual agreement that says their adopted son will spend one year with one parent and then the next year with the other, according to US tabloid the "Star". This annual custody switch will be lasting for the next four years until the agreement is reviewed again. Sharon is working hard this year, as she's involved in shooting five films back-to-back in 2006, so Bronstein felt the toddler would be better off staying at his home and attending school regularly, rather than traveling to various film sets. Roan will be living in San Francisco, California, where his father is editor-in-chief of the "San Francisco Chronicle" newspaper. The blonde star has also another adopted son, eight-month old Laird, but this one is only hers, as she went on with the adoption procedures after divorcing from Bronstein.
