

5 July 2007

By: Bogdan Popa, Security and Search Engines Editor

YouTube Star to Share Hollywood With Angelina Jolie

The Hollywood producers are interested in YouTube users

One of the most active members of YouTube and a Greek film producer, Orthodoxos Theodoulou, caught the attention of the Hollywood stars and might change its home very soon. It seems like the large media production houses from the famous district are interested in partnering with the YouTube user to produce new movies and help him improve its projects. According to The London Greek News, Orthodoxos who is currently working on a new project entitled S-300, produced several popular videos such as Meat Balls and Fajin. The interesting fact is that the YouTube user started this entire business as a simple hobby and is now close to sign a deal that might change his life. "I began filming my mum and dad as a hobby and to make my family and friends laugh, but following the massive press interest this has now been transformed into a full time job," he said according to the same source. It was proved once again that YouTube is not only an online video sharing service but also a popular product able to change someone's life. Think at the numerous social causes supported by the Google solution and at the lives it managed to save. A few months ago, a woman fighting against leukemia turned to YouTube to make her story known in the entire world and to request help for a bone marrow transplant. She managed to find a matching donor in Denmark after the clip recorded a considerable number of views and a lot of comments meant to encourage the woman. Also, YouTube helped several police officers to find and resolve important cases because the video service's community was always opened to information requirements. If you didn't know, the police from several countries posted surveillance clips on YouTube in order to get details about the suspects and arrest them quicker.